Introduction

Thursday 6th May 2010 saw the biggest ever effort by a far right party in a British general election, with 338 candidates standing for the British National Party (BNP) breaking the record set by the National Front in 1979, when they stood 303 candidates. The BNP hoped to make a serious challenge for seats in East London and Stoke on Trent.

On the same day, elections were held for all 32 London boroughs (although not the London Assembly), and 132 other metropolitan boroughs, district councils and unitary authorities in England. The BNP stood 739 candidates in these local elections, 28 of whom were sitting BNP candidates hoping for re-election.

Beyond the BNP, other fringe far right parties stood in the general and local elections, of whom the best known was the National Front, with 17 Parliamentary candidates and 18 local election candidates.

The Respect Party, an amalgam of far left and Islamist political activists, stood ten Parliamentary candidates and 64 council candidates, and hoped to win Parliamentary seats in Birmingham and East London.

This report will analyse the performance of these parties in the general and local elections and explain some of the reasons for their successes or failures. It will look at some examples of third-party campaigning of interest to the Jewish community. Lastly, it will speculate on the future paths of these extremist trends in electoral politics.

Political Background

The general election took place against the backdrop of a recent recession which had left a severe budget deficit, and a lingering problem of trust and credibility engendered by the expenses scandal of 2009. Issues of specific interest to the Jewish community, such as Israel, antisemitism or terrorism, played little or no role in the election. The issue of immigration did emerge during the campaign, but it never reached a dominant position in the political debate. The BNP sought to exploit all these issues to present themselves as the only party that cared about white working class voters.

The BNP entered 2010 with the momentum of a series of electoral successes which had brought them a seat on the London Assembly in 2008, and two MEPs in 2009. They were already the second-biggest party on Barking & Dagenham council with 12 councillors, and had serious hopes to become the biggest single party or even to take outright control of the council.

British National Party

General Election

The British National Party (BNP) went into this general election with genuine hopes of breaking the mould by making a serious challenge for a seat in Parliament, and establishing the BNP as Britain's fourth political party. In fact, they suffered a series of embarrassing defeats and an overall decline in their average support.

The BNP stood 338 candidates in England, Scotland and Wales, the highest number ever put forward in a general election by any far right party. This was a significant increase on the 119 BNP candidates in the 2005 general election, or their 33 Parliamentary candidates in 2001. The BNP's hopes and efforts were mainly to be found in the seats of Barking, East London, which was contested by party leader Nick Griffin; the neighbouring seat of Dagenham & Rainham, contested by Michael Barnbrook; and Stoke on Trent Central in the West Midlands, where the BNP candidate was their Deputy Chairman Simon Darby.

Beyond these key seats, the geographical spread of BNP candidates gives some indication of where their organisational and numerical strength as a party currently lies. They stood in all 29 Parliamentary constituencies in the North East region; 48 out of 54 seats in Yorkshire & The Humber; 33 out of 46 seats in the East Midlands; and 41 out of 58 in the East of England. By contrast, they only managed to stand in 19 out of 55 seats in the South West; 26 out of 84 in the South East (excluding London); 38 out of 75 in the North West; 13 out of 59 in Scotland; and 34 out of 73 in London.

The BNP's best result came in Barking, where Griffin came third with 6,620 votes, or 14.6% of the votes cast. Their second best result came in Dagenham & Rainham, where Barnbrook also came third, with 4,952 votes at 11.2%. These are both creditable results: they were the only two third-place finishes achieved by any BNP candidates, and Griffin polled the highest number of votes ever cast for a far right candidate in a British general election. In 2005, Richard Barnbrook (no relation) had also come third in Barking, with 4,916 votes at 16.9%. Still, these results were disappointing for the BNP, who had hoped to come (at least) second in Barking. In the end, Griffin was a very distant third behind Margaret Hodge, who held the seat for Labour with an increased share of the vote. The reasons why the BNP fell short of expectations will be discussed in more detail in the 'Analysis' section of this report (see page 4), but it is worth noting that voter turnout rose from 50.5% in the 2005 general election to 61.4% in 2010; however, this was still below the average turnout in London (64.6%) and nationally (65%).

Overall, the BNP polled 563,743 votes nationally, or 1.9% of the national vote. While this is an increase from the 192,746 votes they polled in 2005, the higher figure is to be expected given that they stood in nearly three times as many seats. In fact, the average BNP vote share in the 338 seats they contested was 3.7%, down from the 4.2% they achieved in 119 seats in 2005. Similarly, 71 of the 338 BNP candidates, or 21%, retained their financial deposits by achieving 5% or more of the vote in 2010; whereas in 2005, 34 of their 119 candidates, or 29%, retained their deposits. In terms of both vote share and deposits lost, therefore, the BNP's decision to spread themselves so thinly across the country may have come at the cost of a decline in their average performance. This is not just statistical: at £500 per deposit, the BNP's 267 lost deposits will have cost the party £133,500.

Other notable results for the BNP include 10.4% of the vote in Rotherham: 9.4% in Stoke on Trent South; 9% in Burnley; 8.9% in Barnsley Central and 8.6% in Barnsley East. In Stoke on Trent Central, Simon Darby came fourth with 7.7% of the vote. The BNP's results across the country add further weight to the idea that the party is in retreat across the south of England, has patchy support in the Midlands and the North West and is strongest in Yorkshire and the North East. Of the BNP's best 20 results in the general election, nine came in the Yorkshire & The Humber region, five in the West Midlands and three in the North West; none were in the South East or South West and the only two in London were in Barking and Dagenham & Rainham. They retained 40% of their deposits in Yorkshire & The Humber, 37% in the North West, 32% in the West Midlands and 31% in the North East; but only 15% of their deposits in London, just two deposits in the East of England, one in Wales and none in the South East, South West or Scotland. 18 of the BNP's best 20 results came in seats won by Labour and the other two were in seats previously held by Labour but lost at this election.

Before the general election, Nick Griffin had promised that it would confirm the BNP as the UK's fourth political party, a boast which the BNP has repeated in the days following the election. In fact, as with much of the BNP's public analysis of their performance, this claim is not justified by the facts. Discounting the Scottish National Party which polled more votes than the BNP but only stood candidates in Scotland, the BNP came fifth on the national share of the vote. Although the BNP tended to beat candidates from the United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP) when they contested the same seats, on a national level they were easily out-performed by UKIP who stood 572 candidates and polled 917,832 votes. The only regions in which the BNP came fourth were the North East and Yorkshire & The Humber. Overall, 162 BNP candidates – just short of half - came fourth in their respective seats.

Local Elections

The BNP stood 739 candidates in the local elections, in 21 London boroughs and 79 other local authorities (they also stood in the mayoral election in the London borough of Lewisham, coming sixth with 2.7% of the vote). If the BNP's general election results came as a disappointment to the far right party, their performance in the local elections was little short of catastrophic. Of the 28 BNP councillors across England who were up for re-election, only two managed to keep hold of their seat. No other BNP candidates managed to win a seat anywhere. This was a brutal cull that saw the BNP's representation in local government cut almost in half, from 54 councillors to 28 (plus their single seat on the London Assembly). In Barking & Dagenham, where becoming the single biggest party was the BNP's main target in the entire election, they lost every seat they held on the council. They also lost their sole seats on Havering council and Redbridge council, meaning that they no longer have any councillors in London.

The BNP also lost three of their four seats in Epping Forest, both their seats in Sandwell, two of their seven seats in Stoke, two of their four in Burnley and one each in Leeds, Redditch and Solihull. Their single biggest council group is now in Stoke, where they still have five councillors. The two council seats that the BNP did win came for Brian Parker in Marsden ward, Pendle, and for Paul Cromie in Queensbury ward, Bradford. Both were already BNP councillors, and the BNP still have two councillors on each of those councils. Taken regionally, they have seven local councillors in the West Midlands (five of whom are in Stoke), seven in the East Midlands, five in the North West, four in Yorkshire & The Humber, four in the East of England and one in the South East.

Elsewhere, there was little to cheer up the BNP. In Barking & Dagenham they missed out on victory by one place in 12 of the 17 wards they contested. In Rotherham, BNP candidates came second in four wards (Brinsworth & Catcliffe, Maltby, Rotherham West and Valley), in addition to the 10.4% they polled in the general election. Other second places came in Primrose ward, South Tyneside; St. Helen's ward, Barnsley; Tilbury Riverside & Thurrock Park ward and Tilbury St. Chads ward, both in Thurrock; Bentilee & Townsend ward, Stoke-on-Trent; Gawthorpe ward, Burnley; Kirkdale ward, Liverpool; Charlestown ward, Manchester; and Douglas ward and Ince ward, both in Wigan. But for the vast majority of the 739 BNP candidates, this was a very disappointing election.

The BNP stood full slates of candidates in South Tyneside, Basildon, Thurrock and Sandwell. They had 16 candidates out of 17 seats in Solihull, 17 out of 19 in Southend-on-Sea, 19 out of 21 in Wakefield, 21 out of 22 in Kirklees, 31 out of 34 in Leeds, 21 out of 23 in Barnsley, 24 out of 26 in Newcastle upon Tyne and 16 out of 22 in Gateshead. However, the large total number of BNP candidates masks some significant gaps in their presence on ballot papers around the country. In Stoke-on-Trent, the BNP's main target area after Barking & Dagenham, the party could only find candidates to stand in six of the 20 seats on offer. In Oldham, where the BNP first gave a hint of their electoral potential in the 2001 general election, the party only stood in one of the 20 seats being fought. In Bradford, where they did win a seat, they only stood in ten out of 30 seats; and in Pendle, the site of their other success, they only stood in half the 18 seats available. In Rotherham they only stood in 11 out of 21 seats. Even in Barking & Dagenham, the BNP's main target, they only managed to stand 34 candidates for the 51 seats on offer.

Analysis

The shock of the BNP's defeat at this election cannot be overstated. While they had only an outside chance at best of taking a Parliamentary seat, they were genuinely confident of becoming the biggest single party on Barking & Dagenham council, a fear shared by their opponents. That they not only failed to do so, but in fact lost every seat they held on the council, surprised everybody.

The BNP's failure was largely down to two factors: devastating internal divisions and anti-fascist campaigning that was unprecedented in its scale and sophistication. The ongoing challenge to the BNP's legal status by the Equalities and Human Rights Commission had disrupted the party's pre-election planning and taken up both their attention and financial resources. In the weeks prior to the election campaign, the BNP's Director of Publicity, Mark Collett, was expelled from the party after allegations that he had made threats to kill Nick Griffin and James Dowson, the BNP's main fundraiser, for which he was arrested by Humberside police. At the same time, veteran BNP activist Eddy Butler was sacked as the party's National Organiser and, more importantly, their Elections Organiser, and Emma Colgate was removed from her position as staff manager to the BNP's two MEPs. The wider allegation was that they were part of a clique that was plotting to overthrow the party leadership. In Stoke, the leader of their group on the council, Alby Walker, left the BNP in January claiming that "there is a vein of Holocaust denial running through the BNP." His wife, also a councillor, left the party in April. The disruption this caused to the BNP branch is the main reason why they only managed to stand in six council seats in Stoke. Then just a few days before polling day, Simon Bennett, the BNP's webmaster, fell out with Griffin and Dowson to such an extent that he took down the BNP's website. This was not a party in a fit state to challenge for power.

The other side of the coin of the BNP's failure was the anti-fascist campaigning that they faced, principally from Searchlight magazine's Hope Not Hate campaign. The BNP's successes in 2005 and 2006 were based on a low turnout and a fall in Labour's vote. While Labour made a focused effort to reconnect with their traditional supporters, Hope Not Hate concentrated in getting out the anti-BNP vote. Approximately 1,000 people volunteered for Hope Note Hate in Barking during the election campaign, and 200-300 in Stoke. Hundreds of thousands of leaflets were targeted at different types of voters, while email and websites were also used in a campaign as sophisticated as anything used by the mainstream political parties. In both the local and general elections, it was the return of the Labour vote that caused the most damage to the BNP's ambitions. Another new factor in 2010 was the 'Nothing British about the BNP' campaign group, which aimed to encourage anti-BNP activities from a centre-right perspective. This group challenged the BNP's use of traditional patriotic messages, such as Winston Churchill and World War Two imagery, and successfully mobilised public opposition to the BNP from high-profile military personalities. If anti-fascism in history has often involved street violence and physical force, 2010 was the year when electoral anti-fascism really came of age.

As was to be expected, the BNP leadership put on a brave face after the election, but they could not mask the depth of their failure and faced immediate criticism from within the party. Griffin's immediate response to their collapse in Barking & Dagenham was to declare London as "occupied territories" in which the BNP could no longer hope to win elections. Nationally, he has pinned his future hopes on the possibility that electoral reform, promised by the new Conservative/Liberal Democrat coalition government, would open up a new route into mainstream politics for smaller parties like the BNP. This may be overly optimistic, but it is ironic that a BNP that has suffered such a devastating electoral blow is depending on the Liberal Democrats being in government to revive it. Before this happens, though, Griffin may have trouble simply holding his party together, and retaining his grip on the leadership. His subsequent announcement that he would stand down in 2013 may not be enough to silence his critics. Dissent quickly spread through online social networks of BNP supporters, stirred up by Eddy Butler and the other senior BNP activists who Griffin had expelled before the campaign began.

In the European elections in 2009, the BNP polled just short of 950,000 votes across the entire United Kingdom. This year, despite the BNP's internal problems and their loss of council seats, they still got over half a million votes across 338 Parliamentary constituencies (out of a possible 650 seats). This suggests that they now have a core vote of around 900.000 voters across the UK. It should also be remembered that Griffin did manage to increase the BNP's vote in Barking, but this achievement was rendered irrelevant by the significant increases in votes for both Labour and the Conservatives. The experience in Barking & Dagenham also shows that, while the BNP may retain its core vote, there are large numbers of people who are motivated enough to campaign against them, and even more people who can be persuaded to use their vote to keep them from power. The BNP will not disappear from local politics and campaigns like Hope Not Hate will continue to be necessary in the future. Their work will be made easier by the fact that the BNP has not lost the far right's tendency for self-destruction.

OTHER FAR RIGHT PARTIES

None of the smaller far right parties that fought the 2010 elections can be considered any sort of significant political force. The National Front (NF) stood 17 candidates in the general election. all of whom lost their deposits. Their presence around the UK is patchy in the extreme: they stood four candidates in London, three in the South East, three in Yorkshire & the Humber, one in the North East, three in the West Midlands and two in the North West. Their best result came in Rochdale, where Chris Jackson, a veteran far right activist, polled 2,236 votes at 4.9%. In the local elections the NF stood 18 candidates: three for Hillingdon council in London; five in Birmingham, two in Dudley, one in Newcastle, two in North Tyneside, two in Kingston-Upon-Hull, one in Maidstone, one in Amber Valley in the East Midlands and one in Rossendale in the North West. Most of the NF candidates came last in their ward. Their best results came in Rossendale. where Kevin Bryan came third in Irwell ward with 11.6% of the vote; and in Sheldon ward, Birmingham, where Paul Morris came fourth with 8.85% of the vote.

The Democratic Nationalists, a small far right remnant of a previous BNP split, stood general election candidates in Bradford South and Bradford West, both of whom came bottom of the poll. Their two candidates, James Lewthwaite and Neil Craig, also stood in the local elections in Bradford, both coming last in Royds ward and Wyke ward respectively.

The England First Party, led by former American Friends of the BNP organiser Mark Cotterill, is a small group of former BNP supporters and other 'racial-nationalists'. They stood seven candidates in the local elections: three in Stoke-on-Trent, and one each in Oldham, Pendle, Preston and Wigan, all in the North West region. Their best results were in Longton North ward, Stoke-on-Trent, where Mark Leat came fourth with 606 votes (10.3%); Ribbleton ward, Preston, where Cotterill came fourth out of four with 315 votes (12.5%); and in St. James ward, Oldham, where Andrew Clayton came fourth out of four with 425 votes (10.5%).

THE RESPECT PARTY

General Election

The Respect Party was created in 2004 out of a combination of far left and Islamist political activism, primarily to campaign on an anti-war ticket in areas with relatively large Muslim populations. Respect stood ten candidates in the general election, of whom four were in London, four in the North West, one in Birmingham and one in Bradford. Of these, their best chances of success lay with Salma Yaqoob, the party leader, who ran in Birmingham Hall Green and was hoping to become Britain's first hijab-wearing MP; George Galloway, who had left his Bethnal Green & Bow seat to challenge in the neighbouring Poplar & Limehouse constituency; and Abjol Miah in Galloway's old Bethnal Green & Bow seat.

Most of the media attention was focused, as ever, on Galloway, who came a disappointing third place with 8,532 votes or 16.8%. Miah also came third, with 8,160 votes (17.5%). Galloway's much-promised unseating of Labour's Jim Fitzpatrick MP, who he had accused of "waging war on Muslims" during the campaign, failed to materialise and Galloway did not even attend the count to hear his defeat formally announced. More humiliating for Galloway was the fact that he was beaten into third place by the Conservatives, for whom that part of East London has traditionally been an impossible place to win. In both East London seats, the turnout was higher than in 2005, but lower than both the London and national averages, suggesting that Respect, like the BNP, had benefitted in 2005 from a low turnout, rather than suffering from an unusually high turnout in 2010.

Respect came closest to winning a seat in Birmingham, where Salma Yaqoob came second with 12,240 votes (25.1%) thanks to a significant swing from Labour to Respect, but again failed to unseat the Labour MP Roger Godsiff. None of Respect's other Parliamentary candidates managed to retain their deposits, and only one, Arshad Ali in Bradford West, managed to poll more than 1,000 votes.

Local Elections

Respect stood 85 candidates in the local elections and here, too, they suffered significant setbacks, losing seven of their eight sitting councillors on Tower Hamlets council and their one councillor in neighbouring Newham. Of their 50 candidates in Tower Hamlets (where three councillors are elected in each ward), only one won a seat – Harun Miah in Shadwell ward – and three others missed out by one place. In Newham, two Respect candidates missed out on a seat by one place. In Birmingham, where a third of the council seats were up for election, Salma Yaqoob retained her seat but the three other Respect candidates were defeated.

Elsewhere, Respect candidates failed to make any sort of impression. They stood candidates in Redbridge, Bradford, Manchester, Salford, Oldham and Rochdale, but none came close to winning. Indeed, of the 19 Respect candidates in these areas, 14 came bottom of the poll. The only ward that showed some promise for the future was Milkstone & Deeplish in Rochdale, where Javed lqbal came third with 21% of the vote. This leaves Respect with a total of four local councillors: three in Birmingham (all in the same Sparkbrook ward) and one in Tower Hamlets.

Analysis

Respect always had limited appeal, both in terms of its policies and the section of the electorate at whom it directed its efforts. In 2005, with anger over the Iraq war running high, this was enough for Respect to win a Parliamentary seat in Bethnal Green & Bow and perform well enough to promise more success in the future. The following year, Respect stood 163 candidates in the local elections, winning sixteen council seats and establishing themselves as a significant opposition on Tower Hamlets council. However, small fringe parties need favourable political conditions and internal harmony to prosper, and Respect, just like the BNP, has not been able to maintain its electoral momentum.

The most significant factor in Respect's decline was a split in the party in 2008. The ejection of the Socialist Workers Party (SWP) left Respect in the hands of Galloway, Yaqoob and their mainly Muslim followers. This cost Respect an important section of their political activists and organisational structure, while hitching it even closer to Galloway's particular brand of celebrity politics. While some leftists from the SWP and other groups did remain with Respect, the fact that the party's strength is so localised reflects the fact that its voter appeal is still community-based. However, this is far from the whole story and it would be wrong to assume that Respect is synonymous with Muslim electoral ambitions. Yaqoob has experienced resistance to her political ambitions from older, more conservative Muslims who do not like the idea of a young 'hijabi' being such a high-profile politician. Galloway lost a lot of Muslim support when he debased himself on the Big Brother reality TV show. He was replaced in Bethnal Green & Bow by the Labour candidate Rushnara Ali - a Bangladeshi woman who has become the first Bangladeshi to sit in Parliament, bringing much pride to her community as a result. With British soldiers no longer in Iraq and more pressing issues of the economy, unemployment and housing coming to the fore, Respect's particular character and image offer little to address the primary concerns of voters, whether Muslim or not.

The question of 'what happens next' has always hovered around Respect, and is more acute now than ever. The fact that Respect only managed to stand just over half the number of candidates that they had in 2006 suggests that they are a declining force, even before their 2010 losses are factored into the equation. Galloway has promised to remain with the party and even raised suggestions that he might stand for Mayor of Tower Hamlets (which will be directly elected in October 2010), but has also spoken of broadening out his already diverse media activities. It would not be a surprise if his future ambitions lie elsewhere. Yaqoob remains eminently electable, but might have to leave Respect to fulfil her ambitions; she would definitely be an MP by now had she stood for one of the three main parties. Respect has also failed to establish a permanent and reliable support base, even amongst the Bangladeshi community in East London where it has found most support. Respect councillors in Tower Hamlets have defected to Labour, the Liberal Democrats and the Conservatives in the past four years. This process is likely to accelerate after their 2010 collapse; their Tower Hamlets Chairman, Azmal Hussein, announced within days of the election that he was leaving the party. While Respect is likely to remain active in local politics in Birmingham and East London, it would take a significant victory, such as winning the mayoralty of Tower Hamlets, to reverse the party's general decline.

COMMUNITY CAMPAIGNING

As with previous elections, there was some public debate as to the existence and nature of a supposed 'Muslim vote' in the general election. Some organisations, particularly those of an Islamist or anti-Zionist orientation, tried to mobilise and direct Muslim voters for or against particular candidates.

The Muslim Council of Britain (MCB) launched 'Muslim Vote 2010', to encourage British Muslims to vote in the general election. The website followed the MCB's practice at previous elections of not endorsing any particular candidates or parties, but instead encouraging voters to ask candidates for their views on specific issues. In 2010, these were listed as anti-Muslim hatred and Islamophobia; public services; democratic renewal; foreign affairs; security and counter-terrorism; education; and employment. This wide range of concerns reflected the MCB's opinion that it would be wrong to assume there is such a thing as a Muslim bloc vote: "the Muslim voter, like any other Briton, may well make discerning choices of which their 'Muslim identity', if ever there was one, is only a part of a menu of considerations." This campaign was also partly a response to the view put forward by some groups, that voting in the elections was 'haram', or not allowed according to Islamic law.

A similar venture, set up and run by activists from the anti-Israel Friends of al-Aqsa pressure group, was called 'You Elect'. You Elect also set out to encourage participation in the election, while not endorsing any specific candidates or parties. Their work included leaflets to encourage voter participation – one of which was produced jointly with the Islamic Forum of Europe – opinion polls of Muslim voters and organising hustings for candidates. As befits a campaign run by a single issue pressure group, its list of questions for candidates had a much narrower focus: Islamophobia, freedom of dress, extremism, climate change, foreign policy and aid.

The Palestine Solidarity Campaign issued a six-point election pledge that it asked candidates to answer. The points included calls for an arms embargo on Israel and limited economic sanctions. The pledge was signed by 30 Labour candidates; 28 Liberal Democrat candidates; no Conservatives; 79 Greens; and all ten Respect candidates. The PSC also claimed to have received an official response from the Liberal Democrats as a party, which included endorsing an arms embargo and suspension of EU trade agreements with Israel "until the blockade of Gaza is lifted". PSC also organised election hustings around the country. However, the Israel-Palestine conflict as an issue did not play any significant role in the election campaign, and was not even mentioned in the second televised leaders' debate, which focused on foreign affairs.

The British Muslim Initiative (BMI), which is closely aligned with the Muslim Brotherhood, issued a list of "recommended candidates" for Muslims. This is the same approach as that taken by the BMI's predecessor organisation, the Muslim Association of Britain, in 2005. Unlike the MCB, the BMI did endorse the idea of a 'Muslim vote' that could swing elections, arguing that: "The Muslim vote does not only count. It can decide. Vote responsibly and vote tactically." The BMI's list included 52 candidates: 26 Labour, 16 Liberal Democrats, five Conservatives, three from Respect, one Green and one Independent. However, the BMI's lack of a grassroots campaigning structure meant that this list was not backed up by significant campaigning support and no consistent pattern was discernable in the fortunes of the BMI's preferred candidates.

One organisation that did engage in on-the-ground campaigning was the Muslim Public Affairs Committee (MPAC), which has developed a strategy over successive elections of targeting individual MPs who it considers to be "Zionist" or "pro-war". In 2010 MPAC produced a list of 32 MPs and four Prospective Parliamentary Candidates (PPCs) which it titled, "Is your MP a Zionist?" It then whittled this down to seven constituencies where it actively campaigned against the sitting MP: Claire Ward in Watford; Denis MacShane in Rotherham; Andrew Dismore in Hendon; Terry Rooney in Bradford East; Phil Woolas in Oldham East & Saddleworth; Khalid Mahmood in Birmingham Perry Barr; and Mike Gapes in Ilford South. Some of these have been long-running campaigns: Gapes, for example, complained in the House of Commons about the activities of MPAC after the 2001 general election. MPAC calls its campaign a "Jihad" and its material is often extremely abusive about its targets, describing them as "Zio-Nazis" amongst other insults. This kind of scare-mongering can have an impact on voters, and those candidates who are targeted by MPAC often feel the need to respond by pointing out their good relations with mosques and Muslim groups in their constituency.

Of the seven MPs targeted by MPAC, three lost their seats, for which MPAC claimed the credit. However, this does not tell the whole story. One of the unseated MPs, Andrew Dismore in Hendon, suffered a smaller swing against him than in neighbouring seats and has been replaced by Matthew Offord, a Conservative who has a long pro-Israel record. Another, Claire Ward in Watford, has been replaced by Richard Harrington, formerly the Chairman of Conservative Friends of Israel. These examples point to the immaturity of MPAC's approach, and the ultimate futility of their narrow agenda. This was summed up by their campaign to unseat Terry Rooney, who has never engaged in pro-Israel campaigning and signed the PSC election pledge, on the grounds that he is a "pro-war Zionist".

MPAC's style also introduces a poisonous tone into local campaigning: Lee Scott, a Jewish MP in the neighbouring Ilford North constituency to Mike Gapes, suffered antisemitic death threats that he believed were indirectly attributable to the atmosphere generated by MPAC. While MPAC is capable of generating a short-term, local effect, its tactics have not shown evidence of a sustainable, long-term impact: Mike Gapes, who has suffered its particular brand of campaigning more than any other MP, actually increased his share of the vote in 2010, and polled more votes than in any general election since before MPAC began its campaigns against him.
